Jane Doe

Durham Regional Crime Stoppers is asking for your help to solve a cold case from 2006.

On October 27, 2006, the remains of a female were discovered in a field near South Service Road and Holt Road, in Clarington, Ontario. Forensic investigators determined the woman was likely between 18 to 25-years of age. It was originally thought that the victim was either Caucasian or of Indigenous descent. Durham Regional Police Service reached out to the DNA Doe Project which used genetic genealogy to confirm the female is of African and South-East Asian descent.

Although the female's remains were not found until 2006, it is estimated that she could have died anytime between 1980 and 2004. She had prominent upper teeth and there was evidence of recent nasal surgery.

Originally found with the body was a woman's digital Omni watch with a stainless-steel band which was sold exclusively at Consumers Distributing from 1981 to 1983.

Also found near the remains, was a size 9½ gold ring with a garnet between two one-point diamonds. The word "Burns" was stamped inside, and the ring is believed to have been sold by Burns Jewelers, a family-run business on Simcoe Street in Oshawa from 1923 to 1994. The ring was made by A&A Manufacturing in Toronto.
